BY THE terms of the Ancient Monuments Acts, 1913-53, the Minister of Works (as successor to the Commissioners of Works) is required to prepare and publish from time to time a list of monuments whose preservation is considered to be of national importance.

When a monument is included in such a list, the owner and occupier are required by the Acts not to demolish, remove, repair, alter or make additions to the monument without giving three months notice to the Ministry of Works of his intention to do so.

The primary object of the list, therefore, is to register the fact that the preservation of the monument is in the national interest and thereby to enlist the support of owners and others in the protection of these monuments and minimize the danger of interference with their essential features. The selection of the monuments is the responsibility of the Ancient Monuments Boards for England and Wales, advisory bodies appointed by the Minister, among whose members are representatives of the following bodies :

The Royal Commissions on Historic Monuments in England and Wales

The Society of Antiquaries of London

The Royal Academy of Art

The Royal Institute of British Architects

The Trustees of the British Museum

The Ministry of Education.

In cases of urgency the Minister of Works has power himself to place a monument on the list. Buildings which are occupied as dwelling houses or are in use for ecclesiastical purposes cannot be included in this list.

The procedure which has to be followed in compiling the list is set out in detail in Section 12 of the Ancient Monuments Consolidation and Amendment Act 1913, and Section 6 of the Ancient Monuments Act 1931. These Sections are reproduced in the appendix to this note. The owner and occupier of the monument are notified formally of its inclusion in the list and, for the benefit of any new owner of the property should it change hands, the particulars are also registered in the Register of Local Land Charges. The Ministry also reminds owners and occupiers from time to time of the inclusion of monuments in the list.

This present publication includes all monuments in England and Wales listed and remaining under the protection of the Acts on 31st December 1960. The list also includes all ancient monuments and historic buildings in England and Wales in the care of the Minister of Works on 31st December 1960 whether under the Ancient Monuments Acts or otherwise.

Although the list contains the names of approximately 9,000 ancient monuments of all kinds, there are still many important monuments in England and Wales which have not yet been included. Steady progress is being maintained but it will be some time before the listing is completed.

Most of the monuments in the list are in private ownership and the Minister of Works is not therefore responsible for their maintenance. The Ministry is, however, always ready to give advice on the treatment of these monuments and, in the case of a few monuments of outstanding importance, may consider financial help towards essential and urgent repairs or, in exceptional cases, accept guardianship under the terms of the Ancient Monuments Acts. It is gratifying to note that public interest in ancient remains continues to grow and that almost all owners are anxious to do their best in assisting to preserve these irreplaceable national possessions.

Appendix to the Preface

Section 12 of the 1913 Act reads as follows :

12. (1) The Commissioners of Works shall from time to time cause to be prepared and published a list containing:

(a) such monuments as are reported by the Ancient Monuments Board as being monuments the preservation of which is of national importance ; and

(b) such other monuments as the Commissioners think ought to be included in the list, and the Commissioners shall, when they propose to include a monument in the list, inform the owner of the monument of their intention and of the penalties which may be incurred by a person guilty of an offence under the next succeeding subsection.

(2) Where the owner of any ancient monument which is included in any such list of monuments as aforesaid proposes to demolish or remove in whole or in part, structurally alter, or make additions to, the monument, he shall forthwith give notice of his intention to the Commissioners of Works, and shall not, except in the case of urgent necessity, commence any work of demolition, removal, alteration, or addition for a period of one month after having given such notice ; and any person guilty of a contravention of or non-compliance with this provision shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding one hundred pounds, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months, or to both.

(3) This section shall not apply to any structure which is occupied as a dwelling-house by any person other than a person employed as the caretaker thereof or his family.

This section was amended by Section 6 of the Ancient Monuments Act, 1931, which reads :

6. (1) Before including any monument in a list published under section 12 of the principal Act after the commencement of this Act, being a monument which was not included in a list published under that section before the commencement of this Act, the Commissioners shall, instead of informing the owner as required by subsection (1) of that section, cause, to be served upon the owner of the monument and upon the occupier thereof (if any) a notice in writing of their intention to include the monument in the list.

(2) No person served with a notice under the last foregoing subsection shall, unless and until the monument to which the notice relates ceases to be included in any such list as aforesaid execute or permit to be executed, except in a case of urgent necessity, any work for the purpose of demolishing, removing or repairing any part of the monument, or of making any alterations or additions thereto, until the expiration of three months after he has given to the Commissioners notice in writing of his intention to do so, and any person acting in contravention of the provisions of this subsection shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding one hundred pounds, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months, or to both.

(3) Where the owner of any monument has been served with a notice under subsection (1) of this section, then (subject to the provisions of the Land Charges Act, 1925, as amended by any subsequent enactment and as applied by this Act) every person subsequently becoming the owner of the monument shall, for the purposes of the last foregoing subsection, be deemed to have been so served.

(4) Subsection (2) of section 12 of the principal Act shall cease to have effect, and for the purposes of subsection (2) of this section the person who, at the commencement of this Act, is the owner of any monument included in any such list as aforesaid which was published before the commencement of this Act, and (subject to the provisions of the Land Charges Act, 1925, as amended by any subsequent enactment and as applied by this Act) every person subsequently becoming the owner of the monument, shall be deemed to have been served with a notice under subsection (1) of this section.

(5) The Commissioners may at any time cause to be served upon the occupier of a monument which is included in any such list as aforesaid, whether published before or after the commencement of this Act, a notice in writing that the monument is so included, and after the service of such a notice upon any such occupier the provisions of subsection (2) of this section shall apply with respect to him as if he had been served with a notice under subsection (1) of this section.

Ancient Monuments can be given additional protection under Section 14 of the 1913 Act, which reads as follows:

14. (1) If any person injures or defaces any monument of which the Commissioners of Works or a local authority are the owners or guardians, or which is the subject of a Preservation Order, or to which this section applies by virtue of an Order in Council made thereunder, that person shall, on summary conviction, be liable either to a fine not exceeding five pounds, and, in addition to the fine, to pay such sums as the court by whom he is tried think just for the purpose of repairing any damages caused by him, or to imprisonment with or without hard labour for a term not exceeding one month.

(2) In England, any person convicted of an offence under this Act may appeal to quarter sessions in manner provided by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts.

(3) The owner of an ancient monument shall not be punishable under this section in respect of any act which he may do to the monument, except in cases where the Commissioners of Works or the local authority have been constituted guardians of the monument, and in that case he may be dealt with as if he were not the owner.

(4) His Majesty may, by Order in Council, declare that this section shall apply to any monument specified in the Order which appears to His Majesty to be an ancient monument within the meaning of the Act, and on any such Order being made this section shall apply accordingly. (An Order in Council is made each year which includes all monuments listed during the preceding year. All listed monuments are therefore protected by the provisions of the section quoted above.)

This Section was amended by Section 14 of the Historic Buildings and Ancient Monuments Act, 1953, which reads as follows :

14. (1) Subsection (3) of section fourteen of the Ancient Monuments Consolidation and Amendment Act, 1913 (which exempts the owner of a monument from punishment under that section for injuring or defacing it, unless the Minister or a local authority is guardian of the monument), shall not apply to anything done after the pass of this Act, except—

- (a) in the case of a monument in respect of which an interim preservation notice or a preservation order is in force, anything done with the written consent of the Minister under subsection (1) of section twelve of this Act ;
- (b) in the case of any other monument, anything done more than three months after the owner has, in accordance with subsection (2) of section six of the Ancient Monuments Act, 1931, given to the Minister notice in writing of his intention to do that thing.

(2) Notwithstanding the preceding subsection, so much of subsection (1) of the said section fourteen as relates to the payment of sums for repairing damage shall not apply to the owner of the monument, except in a case where the Minister or a local authority is guardian of the monument.

(3) For the purpose of determining in any proceedings whether an injunction (whether restrictive or mandatory), or, in Scotland, an interdict or other order, should be granted for preventing or remedying a contravention of subsection (1) of section twelve of this Act, no account shall be taken of the fact that a person has been or may be prosecuted in respect of the act in question by virtue of section fourteen of the said Act of 1913, as modified by this section.

INTRODUCTION

ARCHAEOLOGY is the study of the material remains of past ages. By their means it is possible, or may in the future be possible, to reconstruct, graphically or in writing, a picture of the life of men of different countries at different periods of the world's history. For the early periods it is the only means available for this purpose. For later periods, after the invention of writing, it is a valuable help in filling in such details as are not available in written records.

These material remains are of two kinds. There are loose objects, found from time to time in the soil, such as stone axes, bronze spearheads, iron knives, coins and pieces of pottery, which cannot be preserved to view precisely in the positions where they were found, and which rightly find their home in a museum. There are also the examples, remains or sites of dwelling places and fortifications, burial grounds and religious centres, which from their outward appearance and often still more after skilful excavation add greatly to the store of archaeological knowledge. There is in this country no law which compels the finder to report the discovery of loose objects, except those of gold and silver, which are governed by the law of Treasure Trove. But there is legislation regarding the preservation of ancient sites and historic buildings, namely the Ancient Monuments Acts, the meaning of which for the present purpose is set out in the foregoing preface. The paragraphs, which follow, are intended to explain the categories used in the list of ancient monuments scheduled under those Acts, and so to make it of value to many who are interested in archaeology and history.

It should be emphasized that appearance in this list does not necessarily mean that any particular ancient monument or historic building is open to public inspection. Those which are in the care of the Ministry of Works are indicated by a symbol and are normally open at all reasonable times.

THE EARLIEST PERIODS

The earliest known dwelling-places of man in Britain are certain caves where his presence is attested by finds, which have been recovered from the soil. The occupation may be attributed to the Old Stone Age from the character of implements found, but the caves themselves are natural, and cannot be called works of man. The first sites to which this term can be applied belong to the succeeding period of man's history, the Mesolithic Age, which in Britain may be dated round about 9000 to 3000 B.C. A few dwelling-places of this time are known, but the huts, built no doubt of wood, sometimes over shallow depressions in the soil, are difficult to locate. One, excavated in 1950 at Abinger in Surrey, has been left open to view, and careful excavation of a different kind of site of the same period near Scarborough in Yorkshire has yielded much useful information in the life of this time.

BURIAL MOUNDS AND MEGALITHIC REMAINS

The New Stone Age or Neolithic period is the name given to the time when man, although still lacking a knowledge of the use of metal tools, had already advanced considerably in civilization. He was no longer a mere hunter or fisher. He practised a primitive agriculture and lived a settled rather than a nomadic life. At the present time very few Neolithic dwellings are known, but there are a dozen or so sites which are recognizable as encampments of this time. In the list here published they are for convenience classified as "Camps", but they are more like kraals than fortifications. A roughly circular area is enclosed by a ditch in which there are frequent interruptions or causeways. There is sometimes a bank by the inner side of the ditch, and there may be one or even two other ditches beyond the first and concentric with it. The most famous of these Neolithic "Camps" is Windmill Hill●, near Avebury, Wiltshire, which is always open to inspection.

Much more is known of the people of this time, as also of the succeeding Bronze Age men, from their tombs, which occur in their hundreds and thousands throughout the British Isles. Some of these are long barrows (or long cairns), i.e. mounds which are longer than they are broad, oblong or pear-shaped in plan; many more are circular. The long mounds, according to present knowledge, belong without exception to the Neolithic period, as do some of the round barrows, but by far the greater proportion of the latter are of Bronze Age date. A few of them are later still, since they cover burials of the Roman period (such as the Six Hills at Stevenage, Herts.), whilst the celebrated Sutton Hoo ship burial in Suffolk, excavated in 1939, is a reminder that some round barrows date from Saxon or even perhaps Danish times. The modern word tomb is but a form of the Latin tumulus, which means a burial mound. The Ordnance Survey maps use it alternatively with barrow to denote these mounds. Where burial mounds are known not to be prehistoric, they are here listed as Roman Remains or, where this is uncertain, as Miscellaneous.

These mounds were made of material obtained from the immediate surroundings, often from a ditch which normally encompassed them. Naturally, therefore, those in rocky country are made of stones; these are usually called cairns. In less stony country they may be made partly of stones and partly of soil, perhaps a capping of the former over a core of the latter, or vice-versa; these are usually named cairns or barrows according to their outward appearance. Burial mounds in land devoid of stone are made of earth or turves and are always called barrows or tumuli; the former word, being English, is to be preferred to its Latin equivalent.

Round barrows are to be found in all counties of England and Wales, although there are especially fine concentrations of them on Salisbury Plain, on the Mendip Hills in Somerset, in north-east Yorkshire and elsewhere, whilst the variety known as the disc-barrow, i.e. a circular area defined by a ditch in the middle of which is a small mound, has a more limited distribution. Long barrows abound on the Cotswolds in Gloucestershire, in Breconshire, on Salisbury Plain and in Lincolnshire, but there are few other concentrations of them, and some areas, such as the Midlands of England and Central Wales, seem now to be devoid of any examples. Their absence, however, may be due to the disappearance from the surface of the land of a few examples which once existed.

The human burials, which these mounds were designed to cover and mark, were of many types which cannot all be mentioned here. But it is necessary to mention the most conspicuous examples, since they form the bulk of the megalithic remains named in the title of this section.

It is quite certain that the men of the periods in question believed in a life after death. Otherwise they would scarcely have spent so much labour on the preparation of their tomb and on the ritual at burial, for which evidence is sometimes found in the soil. But in the earlier part of these periods the custom was to bury in a family vault, whereas later individual burial was the rule. It follows that the earlier tombs are larger. This presumably is the fundamental reason for the progressive "degradation" of these tombs, or at least the reduction in size and length of the barrows, until the time when quite a low circular mound is the only external evidence of burial. In the Cotswolds there is a long barrow, 220 ft. long and 10 ft. high. In the Isles of Scilly, on land which cannot ever have been ploughed or much subject to plundering of materials, there are many round barrows 20 ft. or less in diameter and 1 ft. 6 in. high.

The family vaults, burial chambers or chambered tombs as they are called, are of many types. There is little doubt that long barrows in areas where stone is scarce contained burial chambers built of timber or turf or both, but where stone was available they were built of stone. Normally the stones used were big stones—hence the term megalithic—but sometimes irregularities were made good with dry walling of small stones. In Scilly and perhaps in Cornwall a binding material was used, but it was not a true mortar.

Megalithic burial chambers are to be found both in long barrows and round barrows. Some of these have been restored, such as Hetty Pegler's Tump, Uley, Gloucestershire●; Stoney Littleton Long Barrow, Somerset●; West Kennet Long Barrow, Wiltshire● and Bryn Celli Ddu, Anglesey● (round barrow), which may still be entered and are much as the builders made them three to four thousand years ago. But by far the larger number of chambered tombs are now open to the sky even when the capstones remain in position. It is quite certain that they were once completely covered by a mound of stones or earth, which has since been removed for building or agricultural purposes, and this mound should always be restored in the imagination when the tombs are visited. There is much of interest to be learnt from a study of them, since they are the chief evidence of the manner of life of those days, but the reader must be referred for details to other books on archaeology.

These tombs are not the only megalithic remains of England and Wales. There are stone circles, great and small, from the world-famous Stonehenge● and Avebury● downwards. Their nature is implicit in their name, but it should be remarked that the maps sometimes mark as a stone circle a ring of stones which in fact was no more than a kerb to a vanished round barrow or round cairn. There may indeed be some justification for so doing, in that there may well have been some connection between ritual practised at a tomb during burial and afterwards and religious ceremonies which are presumed to have taken place at true stone circles. There has been much speculation about the meaning and use of these circles, and, although careful excavation has added and may well continue to add valuable information, it is unlikely that the complete truth will ever be known.

It is quite common for a stone circle to be surrounded by a ditch and often the upcast from this ditch has been placed on its outer edge to form a bank, as at Avebury● in Wiltshire and Arbor Low● in Derbyshire where all the stones have fallen. In some examples of this kind of monument, where all the stones have been removed, or where excavation has shown that wooden posts were used in place of stones, nothing may be visible above the surface of the ground except the ditch and outer bank. The presence of a ditch within, rather than outside, a circular bank is a sure indication that the site is not a defensive one and marks it as a "ritual enclosure" or "henge monument", to use the current phrases, rather than a camp.

CAMPS

A camp may be defined for the present purpose as a defended area large enough for a community. Fortification of some kind or other is essential to the definition, but private fortresses for individuals or a single family, such as mediaeval castles, are excluded. This category is here used for all types of fortification from the earliest time onwards except those which by excavation or otherwise can be assigned to some other more closely defined group. Most mediaeval fortifications can be easily identified on the ground, although it may well be that some earthworks at present classified as camps will one day be proved to be of later date. In the same way some camps may be proved to belong to the Saxons or Danes. The category here called "camps", therefore, is intended to include fortifications, other than Roman, from the earliest time to those of the few centuries after the end of Roman rule in Britain.

A small class of Neolithic camps, or more properly "kraals", has already been mentioned at the beginning of the preceding section. The examples now known number a dozen or so in England; none is known in Wales. The only fortifications so far proved to belong to any phase of the Bronze Age are a few rectangular or sub-rectangular enclosures of moderate size, which have a single rampart and ditch. These are in Dorset and Sussex, although the famous Celtic temple, found when London Airport was made during the last war and dating from c.300 B.C., i.e. somewhat later in date than this class of Bronze Age camp, was contained within just such a rectangular enclosure. At the other end of the span of time of this category entitled "camps" are those few which have so far been proved to belong wholly or in part to the Dark Ages, the few centuries following the Roman withdrawal from Britain. These have been proved by excavation; it is not yet possible with certainty to assign any camp to this period on sight, i.e. without excavation.

It follows that the category now under discussion relates to fortifications of the Early Iron Age, i.e. the last few centuries before the Roman Conquest, which began in A.D. 43, except for Neolithic camps, late Bronze Age enclosures and Dark Age sites whose character can only be determined by excavation.

These camps are numerous in many parts of England and Wales, especially in the West of England and the Marches. Many of them are on hill tops, giving them the alternative title of hill-forts. But this title is not all-embracing since some Early Iron Age camps are in low-lying situations. Much excavation of these camps has taken place in the last twenty-five or thirty years, but it is still not possible to relate any particular type of camp to a special phase of the Early Iron Age except perhaps in a limited area where several of different types have been examined. As a general guide it may be said that the more elaborate the defences are the later in the period may be the camp in its present form; the appearance of the two most elaborate in England, Maiden Castle●, Dorset, and Old Oswestry●, Shropshire, is now known to be the result of a long process of gradual addition to the defences.

It is possible to divide these camps into sub-categories according to their site and their detailed methods of defence. Some have a bank and ditch which keep closely to one contour or level of a hillside, whilst in others the ramparts disregard contours. Many camps take advantage of natural features, such as cliffs, whether beside the sea or inland, ravines, marshes, rivers, forest formerly existing but now removed, etc. These would make attack in that direction very difficult. Often ramparts are omitted at such points, but this feature is not an indication of date. It is a manifestation of common-sense which may occur at any time under primitive conditions.

The materials used in the defences naturally varied with the country. In rocky areas ramparts of stone were normal, often in the form of thick stone walls, now largely collapsed. In places where little or no stone was available, ramparts were of earth, perhaps revetted with timber, long since decayed, leaving grass-grown banks at the angle of the repose of the sliding earth.

Normally there is a ditch beyond the rampart, since a ditch is a very important part of every fortification of any age on all but steep slopes; it keeps the attacker away from the rampart and slows his advance. There are not many camps which have no ditch, but in some cases on steep hills the main rampart seems to have been composed of material, stones or soil or both, collected from within the camp. The upcast from the ditch in such cases is often to be found outside it, forming what is called a counter-scarp bank. Two or more complete series of banks and ditches are by no means uncommon, although in some examples the second line of defence may be discontinued on the steepest part of the hill since it was deemed unnecessary. Further multiplications of defences also occur, up to the eight banks and ditches which may be seen in part of the enceinte of Old Oswestry●, Shropshire. Sometimes these successive defences follow one another in quick succession, but in other cases they are separated by a slight interval. The reason for this is unknown except where the configuration of the ground makes it obvious for defence. But it is now considered that in general the multiplication and enlargement of defences was brought about by the use of the sling in warfare. By this means it became possible for the defenders to assail the attackers at a distance and the extra defences were added to slow up their advance and so make them assailable for a long period.

The most vulnerable part of any fortification is its entrance, and here wise engineers concentrate their strongest defence. Those of the Early Iron Age were no exception to the rule, and many are the devices which may be seen still, intended to strengthen the defences of the entrance to an Early Iron Age camp. The ends of the ramparts may be curved inwards or turned inwards or outwards to flank the actual pathway in the entrance, thus enabling the defenders to enfilade any attackers in the "jaws" of the entrance. Sometimes the ends of the rampart are merely thickened for the same purpose. Often guardhouses were built in the ends of the rampart. In especially fine examples outworks were added in front of the entrance, in order to make attack more hazardous. It is natural to suppose that simple entrances were made before those of a complicated nature; yet it is already certain that inturned entrances date from quite an early phase of the Early Iron Age.

ANCIENT SETTLEMENTS

This term is used here to describe one or more ancient dwellings, often hut by no means always round huts, whether or not they are enclosed by a courtyard wall; those lying within a wall or bank which may be accounted truly defensive are, however, normally included amongst "Camps". This category represents the dwellings of peaceful folk living on the land by agriculture or pasture, in fact the counterpart of the modern village.

Except in the extreme south-west of England, e.g. on Dartmoor, few of these huts or villages are known to date from before the Early Iron Age. On the other hand abandoned villages which abound in the midland counties of England and which are of a distinctive character with rectangular grass-grown buildings and pathways can be recognized as belonging to the Middle Ages. For that reason they are here classed with Secular Buildings. It follows, therefore, since sites of this kind dating from Saxon and Danish times are almost unknown, that this category is largely confined to the houses of the people of the Early Iron Age. This category, then, in time very closely resembles the foregoing, "Camps", but there is an important difference between the two. The Romans, when occupying Britain, did not, except under special conditions, allow the dispossessed natives to maintain their fortifications, but so far as has been ascertained they left the peaceful country dwellers as they found them. Indeed the peaceful conditions which obtained during most of the Roman period encouraged the multiplication of such settlements. This was particularly the case in Wales, where so far no such settlements have been proved to date from the pre-Roman period, and few to the centuries after the end of the Roman occupation.

ROMAN REMAINS

The Roman invasion of Britain, which was begun in A.D. 43 at the command of the Emperor Claudius, led during the next generation or two to the complete conquest of the lands now called England and Wales. No part of them remained outside the Roman Empire. Yet it must not be supposed that after the initial resistance the natives were constantly rebellious and had of necessity to be restrained by Roman garrisons. This may have been the case in parts of Wales and northern England, but there is no evidence that this happened in southern England, where the inhabitants appear to have taken quickly to the benefits of Roman civilization. In this area, therefore, Roman forts and camps are rare, since they were needed sparingly and for but a few years during the years of conquest. In Wales and the north of England, however, Roman forts with stone walls are to be found. The exception to this rule is the series of fortresses built in the late 3rd or 4th century to protect the east and south coasts of England from the raids of the Saxons. These fortresses, such as Richborough● (Kent), Pevensey● (Sussex) and Porchester● (Hants.), are known as Saxon Shore Forts. All these Roman military works, especially the camps and forts, being laid out to a rule, are normally rectangular or at least rectilinear; Pevensey is an exception. They are seldom on hill-tops.

Apart from forts, fortresses, marching camps and, of course, Hadrian's Wall in Northumberland and Cumberland, there are many works of the Roman period still visible above ground in this country. There are the walls of towns, such as those of Silchester in Hampshire, Verulamium● near St. Albans in Hertfordshire and Caerwent● in Monmouthshire, which still stand to a considerable height, or those of Caister by Norwich in Norfolk, Ircchester in Northamptonshire, or Aldborough● in Yorkshire, which today for the most part appear as a broad grassy bank with a ditch in front. These grass-grown towns are to be distinguished from large Early Iron Age camps by the massiveness of their banks as well as by their position in the countryside—never on a hill-top—and often but by no means always by their rectangularity. Their walls may have been for civic pride as much as for defence.

Within the town wall there were buildings large and small, public and private. At Wroxeter● in Shropshire, now in open fields, part of the buildings of the forum may be seen. Part of a public bath building may be seen in the middle of the modern city of Leicester, whilst in a number of towns portions of dwellings with mosaic floors are visible, for example at Canterbury, and at Aldborough● in Yorkshire. Much of the public baths of Letoctum● may be seen at Wall in Staffordshire. But by far the finest monument of civic life in Roman times now to be seen in Britain are the Roman Baths at Bath.

Roman country houses, commonly called villas, abound in England; the number of known sites is about 500. But in most cases nothing is now visible above ground, and there is no infallible guide to the presence of such a structure. Sometimes the site will appear as a platform, slightly raised above the surrounding land, but, if it has been under plough, even this sign will be wanting. A very common means of discovery is the observance of cubes of mosaic in the scrapings from a rabbit burrow; any such discovery should be reported to the nearest Museum. Occasionally there is a bank and ditch round a Roman house, but this seems to have been for definition rather than defence. A few Roman villas have been kept open after excavation and may be seen by the public. The most famous is that at Chedworth (Gloucestershire). There are others at Witcombe● in the same county, and at Lullingstone● in Kent. Mosaic pavements are visible at Bignor in Sussex, Brading, Isle of Wight, and in Butchery Lane, Canterbury, as already mentioned.

LINEAR EARTHWORKS

This is the name now usually given to a line of bank and ditch, sometimes double or even treble, which goes directly across country instead of curving or turning round to enclose a limited space. The longest in Britain is Offa's Dyke, which runs or ran almost continuously north to south along the marches of Wales for 120 miles. Clearly such a dyke is not a defence of the normal kind, but it seems to have been designed as a frontier line and as a barrier across which cattle raiding would be difficult. Offa's Dyke was built in the reign of King Offa of Mercia (A.D. 757-96), and other similar dykes are known to have been built during the "Dark Ages" after the Roman's withdrawal of their forces from Britain. Many others are assumed to belong to this time, and seem to fit the meagre documentary and archæological evidence for the happenings of the period. Indeed they are looked upon as imitations in earth of Hadrian's Wall in Northumberland and the Antonine Wall in Scotland, themselves fortified frontier-lines.

Nevertheless some of the English dykes date from before the Roman conquest, and it is necessary to keep an open mind on the subject, considering that the erection of such a dyke was a practical measure likely to occur to different peoples at different times.

CROSSES AND INSCRIBED STONES

All in this category are Christian monuments. The later, truly mediaeval crosses are churchyard or market crosses, often now damaged and with heads restored. But the earlier crosses and all the inscribed stones are tombstones.

The early crosses are many and various and often have carved decoration of great interest and beauty. One of the most famous is at Bewcastle, a remote village in northern Cumberland. Portions of others may be seen at Lindisfarne Priory●, Maen Achwyfan●, Flintshire, and Eliseg's Pillar●, Denbighshire, are notable Welsh examples, of which other outstanding specimens can be seen in the museum at Margam●, Glamorgan.

Inscribed stones are a feature of Wales and the western parts of England. The inscriptions are in Latin in debased Roman characters, or in Irish (Gaelic) in Ogham script. Sometimes the inscription on a single stone may be in both languages. There are many of these inscriptions in South Wales. Some are preserved at Margam; others are in the National Museum of Wales at Cardiff. The most famous is in Carmarthen Museum; it is the Voteporix Stone, which commemorates Voteporix, one of the five princes of Britain of the first half of the sixth century, who were denounced by the monk Gildas. Later stones have inscriptions in what is known as Hiberno-Saxon script.

ECCLESIASTICAL BUILDINGS

Since buildings in use for ecclesiastical purposes are excluded from the provisions of the Ancient Monuments Acts, this category is confined to disused churches and chapels, ruined abbeys, a few mediaeval hospitals and the like, which are now either vacant or used for non-religious purposes. It includes a few ruined Saxon churches, such as North Elmham Cathedral●, Norfolk, and a multitude of the remains of abbeys and friaries. Many of the most famous and extensive abbeys are in the care of the Ministry, and to most of them individual guide-books are available.

CASTLES AND OTHER SECULAR MONUMENTS

Here again a provision of the Ancient Monuments Acts must be emphasized. They give no control over inhabited buildings, which, therefore, do not appear in the list here published.

A short general introduction to the study of castles is available (price 3s. 6d.), and may be obtained at many of the monuments or direct from H.M. Stationery Office through any bookseller. The term castle is applied in England to many earthworks and structures from prehistoric to quite recent times. But properly speaking it should not be used for anything before the Norman Conquest in the 11th century or for any later structure which is incapable of defence. A castle was a personal fortress of a man who possessed land, a king or noble; it was his fortified residence or his outpost on the edge of his dominion. Often enough it is easy to recognize a ruin as a castle, but there are cases where it is difficult to decide whether the building should be called a castle or a house. This being a human institution, no hard and fast line of division is possible.

Whereas later castles were normally built of stone or brick, earlier buildings were mostly of earth and timber, and it is the remains of these which occur so frequently in the countryside. The commonest form is that known as the motte or mound-and-bailey castle, which has a high conical mound of earth, flat-topped and surrounded by a ditch, wet or dry according to the springs of the locality and the time of year. Next to the mound are usually one or more baileys or courtyards, each defended by a rampart and surrounding ditch. Sometimes the mound is not very high and is more like a platform than a cone, with or without an encircling rampart, whilst occasionally the main area defended is quite large and the defence consists of a simple bank and ditch. Earthworks of this last type can seldom be identified as belonging to the Norman period without excavation. A good example, however in an unusual situation is the so-called Caesar's Camp near Folkestone, Kent, excavated by General Pitt-Rivers.

Castles of the later Middle Ages were often built in low-lying situations in order to obtain the advantage of defence by water. Often enough, because they were built on a flat and unencumbered site, they are square in plan; examples are Kirby Muxloe Castle●, Leicestershire; Maxstoke Castle, Warwickshire (still inhabited), and Bodiam Castle, Sussex. Many lesser castles and houses were similarly protected by water but, having been mainly of timber, they have decayed and left no trace save for their moats. These are very numerous in the east of England, particularly in Essex and Suffolk. Often they are square or oblong, but by no means always, and almost any shape may be found. As a rule there is a low bank on the outside of the moat, but there are cases where one is to be found on its inner margin. Such moats when long abandoned and ploughed down may sometimes be taken for Roman camps, but the deciding factor in identification will often be the low-lying situation and the external bank of the mediæval moated homestead site. A Roman camp invariably had its ditch outside its rampart and was never built deliberately in wet ground.

The Wars of the Roses in the fifteenth century and the rise of the Tudor monarchy caused the extinction of the noble families, whose private fortresses, castles, had in effect controlled the country for several centuries. Threafter no true castles were built. Coastal defence works built by the King, such as Deal● and Walmer● Castles, bear the name for the lack of a better, but strictly speaking they should be called forts. By now cannon were influencing the design of fortifications, and before long engineers were to come to rely once more upon earthworks, which are solid and low, rather than on lofty towers, which can be easily battered down and become an embarrassment.

By the time of the Civil War of 1642-8, although many old castles and houses were put into a state of defence, all new fortifications were of earth, sometimes revetted with stone. Not many of them have survived, but those that have are easily recognizable by their angular bastions. Many towns put up new defences to enclose suburbs which had grown outside the mediaeval walls, but of all these only small portions remain of the defences of Bristol and Carmarthen. Many new forts were made and quite a number exist in and near Newark in Nottinghamshire, the finest being the Queen's Sconce. Others of this time exist at Dartmouth in Devon, and at Earith and Horsey Hill, both in Huntingdonshire. Additions were made to earlier defences of castles at such places as Sherborne in Dorset, Raglan in Monmouthshire, Cambridge, and Old Basing House in Hampshire. Also there are a few examples of emplacements for siege artillery, slight earthworks with a ditch continuing round all four sides, but a rampart on only three sides. Examples of these batteries occur at Skipton in Yorkshire and at Cornbury Park in Oxfordshire. Finally there are monuments connected with coastal defence in the 18th and 19th centuries; fortifications and martello towers. The latter are all included in the list, the example at Dymchurch●, Kent, being in the charge of this Ministry. There are also a selected number of later fortifications; Portsmouth Long Curtain, Point Battery including King Edward's Tower among other examples.

KEY TO MARGINAL NOTES

- Monuments wholly or partly in the charge of the Minister under the provisions of the Ancient Monuments Acts.
- Monuments wholly or partly in the charge of the Minister under other powers.
- ★ Crown or Duchy property wholly or partly in the charge of the Minister.
- ▲ Crown or Duchy property not in the charge of the Minister.
- A Monuments revealed by aerial photography.
- E Monuments now used for ecclesiastical purposes.
- I Monuments now inhabited as dwellings.

NOTE: For administrative reasons monuments are usually indexed under the name of the Civil Parish in which they are situated. This often results in monuments situated in one village being indexed under the name of another village two or three miles away. (e.g., All monuments in Winchelsea, Sussex, are indexed under Ieklesham).

Specific notes, referring to individual monuments, are placed at the foot of the page on which the name of the monument appears, and are indicated by a raised numeral after the entry.

e.g. Tynemouth, the Monk Stone<sup>1</sup>
